Great Strides

JAPAN IS TURNING FOOTSTEPS into clean electricity using piezoelectric technology.

The technology is embedded in floor tiles in high-traffic areas—such as a Tokyo railway station with over 3.8 million passengers daily—where each footstep depresses the material slightly, generating a small electrical current. The electricity is used to power LED displays and ticketing systems.

Sharing the Trail

Crowded around solitary drums in the four corners of the sacred dance floor are men who are about to play a song they've never heard before.

Standing with the requisite stillness of stalking a deer, a dozen dancers await the first beat. They are in full regalia, some in earth tones and dabbed with war paint, some in neon trim or modern sports team logos, their feet clad in meticulously stitched and beaded moccasins.

They all have a story to tell. They don't yet know how they will tell it. They will cede to the beat how they tell it and where their spirit guides them.

Around them are three judges, armed with small clipboards and discerning eyes. They can't say what exactly they want from the dancers, just that they will know it when they see it.

Up on the stage overlooking the spectacle, master of ceremonies Marty Thurman succinctly describes what is about to unfold: "Organized chaos," he says with a smile.

This is an outsider's introduction to powwow competitions, where Native American performers who have "followed the trail"—remained true to their bloodlines—let centuries of tradition, very little of which has been written down, inspire their sense of belonging.

One Saturday every November—for the last 32 years—the Travis County Expo Center hosts the Austin Powwow, a festival of Native American crafts, culture, food and community. There's handcrafted jewelry and hula dancing, a nod to the event's focus on dance and multicultural appeal. And in the expansive food trailer court, don't skip the Navajo tacos, a culinary delight on Native American fry bread.

The main event is the powwow itself. Derived from the Algonquian pau wau, a word for a medicine man or shaman, modern powwows have evolved as an expression of spiritual identity as tribes were continuously driven from their ancestral lands and pressured by cultural assimilation.

TOP Jazlyn Espinoza, 7, is the 2025–26 junior tribal princess for the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas. She is flanked by two tribal dancers.

“It’s the largest one-day powwow in Texas,” says Nan Blassingame, arena coordinator and a member of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Tribes who moved to Austin in 2003. “Everyone wants to see all the dancers come in at once at noon. Some will go out and go shopping in the market, get in the Indian taco line. Some stay inside and watch the powwow. So, it’s just so much to see. It’s really like three days of powwow rolled into one day.”

Over the course of 12 hours, beginning with the gourd dance, which honors elders, at 10:30 a.m., the floor is in almost constant motion, with dancers of all ages, from tiny tots to juniors to adults to golden age divisions. Twirling to the beat and native lyrics sung by a group of eight to 12 drummers, they compete for prestige and prize money, wearing the markings of their tribes—be it Alabama-Coushatta or Dallas Cowboys.

Head judge Sophia Thurman, Marty’s wife, selects the judges, based on knowledge, dedication, lack of conflicted interest—and the trust that they know it when they see it.

“Something about the dance catches your eye,” she explains. “Something about it makes you think it’s the best dance.”

Whether it’s a strict cultural interpretation or an iconic hodgepodge, the dancers consider their regalia a sacred representation of themselves. It’s not a costume.

“A costume is what you pretend to be,” says Marty Thurman, of Sac and Fox Nation heritage. “This is who we are.”

Steven Toya Jr., from Burleson by way of Zia Pueblo, New Mexico, has danced and sung in almost every state wearing the “Mother Earth colors,” accented by the four sacred Pecos colors: red, white, yellow and black.

Bare-chested except for a bone breastplate and wearing pigtails, a silver double-cross and buckskin leggings, the industrial tire salesman strives to resemble his great-great-grandfather—the last president of the Pecos Tribe.

“We live in a society where we’re not just Native, but we also live in the white Western world. So it’s two worlds coming together—duality,” Toya says. “We practice our traditional custom and culture. And then there’s some of us that still go to church on Sundays, still practice religion, whatever you know your calling is. It’s always still having that tie back to our traditional culture.”

“For us as Native Americans, we always have a protocol, you know, a rite of passage.” In other words, he says, to dance a certain way or style, one has to experience initiation into those respective societies.

Sometimes that initiation goes unfulfilled.

Ralph Pacheco grew up thinking he was Hispanic. Or white. Or South Texas missions Indian (the product of Spanish missionaries’ attempts to assimilate Native Americans centuries ago). Or whatever society said he was at the time.

“I wasn’t Mexican, and I wasn’t white. So at that point, I walked away thinking I was nothing—nothing. I don’t have an identity,” says Pacheco, who sold jewelry at the powwow. “Then later, my elders came and said, ‘We’re the Indians that come from the mission.’ And so it was like a dirty secret. We just don’t talk about it.”

Inspired, Pacheco did more than talk about it. He traced his lineage back to the 1700s, through connections with the Alamo and the Texas Revolution. Now he serves as de facto historian for the Native American Cultural Center in Austin.

Sometimes that initiation comes early. And sometimes it must wait.

Jazlyn Espinoza, 7, is the 2025–26 junior tribal princess for the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas, based in Livingston.

"I enjoy the dancing and being a princess for my tribe," she says.

Her parents travel with her and maintain her Instagram account. Mom Kristina Abbey was raised on tribal land.

"I was surrounded by my Native American heritage but never took advantage of the teachings until now," Kristina says. "I am learning alongside my daughter."

Sometimes the initiation is hidden in plain sight.

Daniel "Dio" Mireles' parents were Hispanic, so he grew up in East Austin believing he was Hispanic.

When he was 12, some cousins mentioned he was adopted. He dismissed it at the time as adolescent teasing but heard the same message about six years ago from another relative.

Neither his father, who had died, nor his mother, then in her 90s, had ever said a word about it. Intrigued and remembering how his birth certificate has his father's signature in place of the obstetrician's, he had his DNA tested. The results confirmed what his relatives said but also gave him an answer he wasn't seeking—he was overwhelmingly Native American.

"I kind of suspected I might be because I was always enjoying going to these powwow festivities," Mireles says.

He pieced together, from records and chats with his family, that he was born in Austin and adopted from a Catholic orphanage in San Antonio and that he might be from the Kickapoo tribe.

Sharon, his wife who is of British descent, says, "He spent his whole life thinking he knew who he was and then realizing he didn't and liking who he might be.

"It's a puzzle with a lot of missing pieces."

Among them are specifics. DNA can legally set paternity or condemn a murderer, but it cannot confirm what Mireles knows unequivocally. For that reason, he is legally barred from wearing an eagle feather in his headdress. He has Native American blood—73% of it—but he can't be recognized under the auspices of the federal Bald and Golden Eagle Protection Act, which says only Native Americans who can document their bloodline can legally possess plumage from the revered avians.

His birth certificate is devoid of information about his birth parents.

So he had an artist make a replica of an eagle feather from a turkey feather.

That he dances with a replica in a dance that reveres tradition is not lost on him. Yet it's that escape from individuality to community—from conformity to consciousness—that identifies the only prey he's pursuing on the trail of his true identity.

"You feel the energy, the sound of the healing, the singing," Mireles says. "It just releases what you know, makes you feel good inside of your heart, your soul, your mind—brings you all together."

What's at the end of the trail is for you to decide. ■

GETTING AROUND TEXAS

Meet the 'grandfluencer' who's inspiring folks to get out and see all they can

HOW BIG IS TEXAS?

Diann Bayes wanted to know. Sure, she could've Googled it and gotten an answer, but she had a better idea.

She drove the entire perimeter of the state, along with Debra Bustos and Morgan Taylor, two colleagues in the travel industry.

"I called them. I'd known them not long at all. And I said, 'Would you like to go with me?' " Bayes says. "Immediately, 'Yes, we want to go.' "

In June 2020, once pandemic travel restrictions were lifted, the three women packed into a rental car loaded with luggage. Their route, which started in the North Texas town of Gainesville, would take them 3,331 miles around the state. (For reference, the drive from New York City to Los Angeles is about 2,800 miles.) They kept to major roads while sticking as close as possible to the state's borders, which was particularly difficult in wide-open West Texas.

It wasn't a race. Bayes, a road trip enthusiast who insisted she do all the driving, made it a point to stop in as many towns and roadside attractions as possible over their nine-day expedition.

They visited Paris' cowboy hat-topped Eiffel Tower and the Kolache Shop in Brazoria, watched a sunrise from South Padre Island, grabbed a steak dinner at Terlingua's Starlight Theatre, saw the University of Texas Permian Basin's Stonehenge replica in Odessa, and checked out the world's littlest skyscraper in Wichita Falls.

"Those little gems are everywhere in this state," Bayes says.

As they journeyed, Bayes documented the trip on her newly created blog, How Big Is Texas, listing every stop along the way and all the parks and museums she would've stopped at if only there'd been more time. It was the start of a new calling—as a travel blogger. Her whole goal, she says, is to help others experience the kind of joy she gets from collecting treasures, memories and stories and head out on their own quests.

"There's cool stories just everywhere," Bayes says. "That is the appeal to me. I love being able to find those stories."

After her trip, Bayes heard from a man who was going to follow her route, though he planned to take a full 30 days to complete the loop. As he traveled, he called periodically to update her on his progress.

"He told me that he had lost his wife years earlier and he just kind of stopped traveling, stopped doing things," Bayes says. "He said because he saw what we did, it encouraged him to get out."

That was exactly what Bayes hoped her blog would accomplish—that it would inspire others to get out and see more of the world.

"People who don't go make me sad," she says. "I mean, there are a lot of people who never leave past their county or leave past, you know, two or three counties away."

Bayes, who spent more than 30 years working in the tourism industry at restaurants, hotels and visitors bureaus, just wants people to get out and explore. It doesn't have to be fancy. Most of her blog is about road trips she takes alone or with friends, often just over a weekend.

In 2021, she teamed up with Darla Dear, her high school best friend and college roommate, for a tour of Texas' "most mispronounced towns and cities." The pair traveled to Colmesneil (COLE-muh-neel), Humble (the "H" is silent), Buda (BYOO-duh), Gruene (GREEN) and Boerne (BER-nee). At each stop, they made friends with locals who affirmed the proper pronunciation.

In 2022, Bayes and Dear spent a long weekend visiting every Buc-ee's in Texas—34 at the time. The friends ate only food purchased from the mega-gas station for the duration of the trip.

"Probably my favorite had to be when we did our Beaver Nugget and wine pairing," Bayes says. "We just were laughing in our hotel room. I mean it was just so funny to us."

JUST GET GOING

To start traveling more, Bayes says, the best thing you can do is just go. There's something for everyone in Texas.

For music lovers, she recommends checking out historic dance halls, like Gruene Hall. In Lubbock, the Buddy Holly Center offers a look into music history.

History buffs already know the Alamo but may have missed the nearby San Fernando Cathedral, the final resting place for some of the Alamo defenders. Bayes recommends Mission San José for the story of pre-statehood Texas.

Foodies have a whole host of options in Texas, including some restaurants that recently received Michelin stars, but Bayes says she's found the best barbecue in small towns at family-run joints.

In the Hill Country, Fredericksburg is a designated Dark Sky community with excellent stargazing opportunities. Big Bend National Park and the surrounding communities also offer incredible night skies with views of the Milky Way.

A state parks pass is only $70 for a whole year of access to our 88 parks. Go for the natural beauty but also for their historic sites.

But the destination isn't always the most important part of a trip. A sunset or sunrise can be enjoyed just about anywhere, and Bayes will never pass up a chance to sit and watch one (and snag a quick picture). And when she's traveling, she doesn't hesitate to pull over if she sees something that intrigues her.

OPPOSITE Darla Dear, left, and Bayes during a long weekend in 2022 when they visited every Buc-ee's in Texas—34 at the time. A signpost at Bayes' headquarters points the way to some of Texas' most uniquely named towns.

LEFT From floor to ceiling, the headquarters' walls are covered in Texas memorabilia acquired from friends and on her travels.

Dear was happy to reunite with Bayes for the trips—and to have the ultimate Texas tour guide. “Just being in the car and getting to spending time with her, she is such a positive person,” Dear says. “I think I know everything there is to know about Texas, but then whenever I get with Diann, she shames me.”

The key to Bayes' ambitious tours of the state, Dear says, is meticulous planning. “She has a schedule, and she sticks to it. She has everything mapped out.”

In 2023, Bayes did a “global tour” of Texas, visiting the towns of Athens, Bogata, Carthage, Geneva, Klondike, Naples, New London, Palestine and Trinidad.

And last year, she completed a long-term goal of visiting all of Texas' 254 counties, though not in a single trip. She's currently working on visiting every state park and all eight of the state's minor league baseball stadiums.

All of it gets documented on the blog, and Bayes keeps her followers updated on social media and started a podcast too. In late 2025, she transitioned to working full time on the blog. Aware that she's an anomaly, starting a social media career in her 60s, she calls herself a “grandfluencer.”

“I'll own that,” she says. “The whole history of my life has led to this.”

Bayes, a fifth-generation Texan, has lived in 22 Texas towns in her life, knows the state well and is eager to show it off, especially the parts off the beaten path.

“Some people say Texans are arrogant,” she says. “I'm one of those proud Texans, and I don't think of it as arrogance. I think of it just as pride, and I hope that other people have that same pride.”

Bayes and her husband, Dan, recently moved to Bullard, near Tyler, where they are members of Cherokee County Electric Cooperative. In their new backyard, Dan constructed a she-shed to serve as a headquarters for her work.

Like Bayes, the office—she calls it the Official International World Headquarters of How Big Is Texas—is full of stories. The building is modeled after a store her great-grandfather owned in Troup. She displays a quilt from her grandmother and a set of dominoes from her great-grandparents that are almost too worn to use anymore.

From floor to ceiling, the walls are covered in Texas memorabilia acquired from friends and on her travels. She leaves the playlist she made for the original perimeter trip on repeat as she works.

“I just have fun memories of things and places I've been, stories that I remember,” she says. “I've got art from people I know and from people I don't.”

There are still plenty more trips she wants to take. “I will look at a map and just go ‘OK where have I not been?’ ” she says. (The list is quickly shrinking but includes 10 state parks, Fiesta San Antonio and Washington's Birthday Celebration in Laredo.)

“I like to go to state parks. I like to go to historic sites. I like to see what the story was. I love town squares, especially in small towns, and I love a diner. I love something that's not fancy. I want to go in because you're going to hear people talking in there.”

A few years back, she visited the London Museum, a small museum in East Texas that tells the story of a 1937 natural gas explosion at a school in New London that killed nearly 300.

At the café across the street from the museum, she met a man who had been a first responder that day. At 101 years old, he was one of the last living rescue workers. He told Bayes about the impact of the explosion on his life and how in the aftermath of that tragedy, legislation passed to add odor to natural gas. It's the stories like his of towns like New London that Bayes says she wants to bring attention to.

“We need to figure out how to tell a story to get people to go see them and maybe go into the grocery store, buy a few groceries or go buy some stamps or something,” she says. “Because otherwise you lose those stories and you lose that town.”

“I want people to go see them, so I'm going to tell that story all day long.” ■

Coordinating Power Across the Grid

WHEN YOU FLIP a switch, electricity is there— instant, reliable and ready to power your day. But behind that simple act is a carefully coordinated system made up of many grid power players, all working together to keep the lights on.

At Karnes Electric Cooperative, we think it's important for our members to understand how this system works and who's involved in delivering the electricity you depend on every day.

It all starts with generation plants that actually produce electricity. Power plants convert energy from a variety of sources—such as natural gas, nuclear energy, wind and the sun—into electricity. A diverse mix of generation sources helps ensure reliability while also supporting affordability and sustainability goals.

Once electricity is generated, it has to be moved— often across long distances—to reach local communities. That's where transmission lines come in.

High-voltage transmission lines strung along massive towers move bulk electricity along highways or across open land. Because electricity can't easily be stored in large quantities, this system must constantly move power from where it's produced to where it's needed, all in real time.

Karnes EC is a member of South Texas Electric Cooperative, our local generation and transmission partner. South Texas EC is a private, not-for-profit wholesale power provider that generates and transmits electricity to Karnes EC and other electric cooperatives in our region.

Coordinating the flow of large amounts of power is a complex job, especially across multiple states or regions. Independent system operators, like the Electric Reliability Council of Texas, and regional transmission organizations, like the Southwest Power Pool, manage wholesale electricity markets.

These organizations don't own power plants or transmission lines. Instead, they act as a traffic controller for the grid—balancing supply and demand every second of the day and directing which power plants should generate electricity at any given moment.

Then there's the part of the grid most people are familiar with—your local electric utility. That's where Karnes EC comes in. We take electricity from the high-voltage transmission system and deliver it directly to your home, farm or business through lower-voltage distribution lines. We maintain utility poles, power lines, electric substations and other essential equipment in our community to keep power flowing safely.

When storms roll through or outages occur, our crews are the ones working to restore power safely and as quickly as possible. We're proud to serve the members across our service area, and we're committed to providing reliable, affordable electricity you can count on.

Finally, there's you—the end user. Homes, businesses and industries all play a critical role in the grid. Your energy use directly influences how much electricity needs to be generated and delivered at any given time.

During periods of high demand— like hot summer afternoons or cold winter mornings—the grid must work harder to meet increased usage. Simple steps, like adjusting your thermostat or running appliances during off-peak hours, can make a meaningful difference.

From generation to transmission to your local utility, it takes a coordinated effort to power everyday life. At Karnes EC, we're proud to be your trusted energy partner—and to play our part in keeping the grid strong for the communities we serve. ■

Always Call 811 Before You Dig

WITH AUGUST 11 just around the corner, Karnes Electric Cooperative is using the 8/11 calendar date as a timely reminder to residents: Always contact 811 to have underground utilities marked before starting any digging project.

Whether you're installing a mailbox or breaking ground on a major construction project, contacting 811 helps prevent accidents, outages and costly repairs.

Every few minutes, an underground utility line is damaged because someone digs without calling 811. Hitting a buried line can lead to serious consequences—from disrupting essential services to causing severe injury.

Striking a single utility line can cause repair costs, inconvenient outages, fines, severe injuries and even fatalities. From building a deck to planting a tree, every digging project requires a free 811 request by phone or online at least two business days before you plan to break ground.

On August 11—and every day—we at Karnes EC remind homeowners and contractors to use 811 before they dig. This simple step protects you, your property and your entire community. It's free, fast and can prevent a life-changing mistake.

Digging soon? Take these steps to stay safe and avoid unnecessary risks:

- ▶ Contact 811 in advance—no matter the size of your project or how well you know the property.
- ▶ Plan ahead and make your request early in the week for weekend projects.
- ▶ Wait for utility lines to be marked and confirm that utilities have responded to your request before starting any digging.
- ▶ Respect the marks and dig with care.
- ▶ Double-check that your contractor has contacted 811 if you've hired one, and never allow unmarked digging to begin.

To learn more about safe digging and to submit a request, call 811 or visit texas811.org. ■

Karnes EC Hosts 88th Annual Meeting

A FRESH-FACED 22-year-old Larry Schendel was elected to the Karnes Electric Cooperative Board of Directors after an election in 1971. He couldn't have known then that he would help shape the cooperative for the next 55 years and counting.

The KEC board is composed of co-op members who represent the wider membership in guiding the not-for-profit co-op they own together. Board members do not take that responsibility lightly.

"My favorite memory is just enjoying the people that work here at Karnes EC and how dedicated they are to serving the members and how financially conscious they are of the members," Schendel said. "And that's why we've done so well."

That's the reason behind KEC's annual meeting: for members to learn how the co-op is doing. The 88th event, June 11 at Karnes City High School, opened to members at noon in hopes of attracting more attendees.

"This has been a great way to get more members out for the meeting," said Eric Halfmann, KEC general manager. "People coming on their lunch breaks, picking up their kids from day-care—it's been really nice to offer this as an option."

A total of 230 members registered over the course of the day, an increase from last year's 221, and the co-op hit quorum well before the start of the sit-down meeting at 7 p.m. A quorum is required to conduct official business, including the election. This year, Frank Geyer, representing District 3, and David Nieschwitz, District 7, ran unopposed and will each serve another three-year term on the board.

Clif Royal, board secretary-treasurer, shared in a prerecorded video that KEC recorded operating revenue of $134.2 million in 2025 and operating expenses of $133.1 million. This resulted in net operating margins of $1.12 million and total margins of $1.23 million.

"Because we are a not-for-profit cooperative, any excess revenue goes back to you in the form of capital credits," Royal said in the video. "Last year, we returned $1.17 million in capital credits to our members."

In Halfmann's prerecorded report, he elaborated on how the cooperative model helps everyone thrive.

"This model allows us to focus on quality service over profit and sets us apart from other utilities," he said. "It enables us to effectively serve lower density and higher cost areas while maintaining competitive rates."

The cooperative recently implemented a new rate structure, but Halfmann emphasized that the costs members pay are still well below the state average and are forecast to be stable well into the future.

Russell Korzekwa, engineering manager, spoke in a video about system growth and the co-op's 2025 work plan.

"The largest projects focus on meeting growing demand in the northern part of our service territory, covering northern Atascosa and Wilson counties," Korzekwa said. "This year, we're launching our next work plan analysis to identify the system improvements needed for 2027 through 2029. This analysis includes a comprehensive engineering and reliability study for the entire system, factoring in projected growth to anticipated future needs."

Another foundational pillar of the cooperative business model is the principle of Concern for Community. Beyond just providing electricity, KEC employees can participate in volunteer days to give back to the local community. That's important for Tammy Labus, finance and account manager, who plans to retire in February after more than 40 years.

"It's always rewarding anytime when you do community service," Labus said. "One of the things I want to do (when I retire) is continue to volunteer. The Humane Society has always had a place in my heart because I used to foster dogs for them once upon a time."

"When you volunteer, if you don't walk away feeling better about life, there's something wrong with you. It's all about service."

Helping people doesn't stop at the edge of the service territory. In November, KEC sent two lineworkers to Guatemala, along with 20 other lineworkers from other South Texas co-ops, to help bring electricity to a remote village. Glenn Kelley and Paul Rodriguez spent more than two weeks helping install 5 miles of line to energize 135 homes.

"It feels good to provide a service that people need," Rodriguez said. "I'm just really grateful being able to have these skills through the co-op; I never would have thought that I could do something like this."

Another way the co-op shows appreciation to the community is through scholarships. This year, Karnes EC was able to increase the amount of money awarded to students, with 31 graduates receiving $3,500 each.

In addition, the co-op sent Logan Dziuk from Poth Independent School District and Kenzie Rakowitz from Jourdan ISD to Washington, D.C., in June as part of the Government-in-Action Youth Tour. Dziuk, Rakowitz and 140 other Texas students visited monuments and museums and learned about government and history.

At the conclusion of the meeting, 85 door prizes—bill credits, coolers, a grill, a $250 bill credit grand prize and more—were awarded. Members didn't need to be present to win, but those who were heard a special message from the general manager.

"I want to humbly thank you, our member-owners, for your trust," Halfmann said. "It is a privilege to serve you, and we remain committed to powering your lives today and into the future. Thank you." ■

Dangers Remain After a Flood

TEXAS IS NO stranger to catastrophic and deadly flooding. Whenever there's heavy rain or nearby hurricanes, the threat of flooding persists. To keep yourself and loved ones as safe as possible, know the precautions to take at all stages of flooding.

Before a Flood

First, consider flood insurance. Homeowners insurance doesn't cover flooding. Flood-hazard maps found at msc.fema.gov show flood risks for each community, which can help determine the type of flood insurance you need.

If you live in an area of high flood risk:

- ▶ Avoid building in a floodplain unless you elevate and reinforce your home, construct floodwater barriers and seal basement walls with waterproofing compound.
- ▶ Install check valves to prevent floodwater from backing up into drains.
- ▶ Elevate the furnace, water heater and electric panel.
- ▶ No matter where you live, create an emergency kit and a family communications plan.

During a Flood

Flash flooding can occur suddenly, with or without typical warnings such as rain clouds or heavy rain. If there's any possibility of a flash flood, move immediately to higher ground.

Before and while evacuating:

- ▶ Secure your home, and move essential items to an upper floor or attic.
- ▶ Turn off utilities at the main switches or valves, but do not touch electrical equipment if you're already wet or standing in water.
- ▶ If you have to walk in water, go where the water is still (just 6 inches of moving water can sweep you off your feet).
- ▶ Do not drive into flooded areas.
- ▶ If your vehicle is trapped in rapidly moving water, stay inside.
- ▶ If water is rising inside the vehicle, seek refuge on the roof.
- ▶ If floodwaters rise around your car, you and the vehicle can be swept away quickly; abandon it and move to higher ground.

After a Flood

Return home only when authorities indicate it's safe, and if you come upon barricades or a flooded road, go another way. Use local alerts and warning systems to get information.

Flooding can make familiar places unrecognizable and dangerous. Roads can weaken and collapse under the weight of a car. Walkways can shift, and debris can hide animals and broken glass or make footing slippery.

Use caution when entering buildings; there may be hidden damage, particularly in the foundations. And don't enter any building surrounded by floodwaters, which may be electrically charged by underground or downed power lines.

Back at home, turn off electricity at the main breaker, even if your community's power is off. When your home is dry enough, you can turn it back on. And contact your insurance agent to discuss claims.

Staying Healthy

A flood can cause physical hazards and emotional stress. As you focus on cleanup and repair:

- ▶ Rest often and eat as well as possible.
- ▶ Stay informed on whether your community's water supply is safe to drink.
- ▶ Keep a manageable schedule by making a list and doing one job at a time.
- ▶ Avoid floodwaters contaminated by oil, gasoline or raw sewage.
- ▶ Service damaged septic tanks and cesspools as soon as possible; damaged sewer systems are serious health hazards.
- ▶ Clean and disinfect everything; mud left by floodwaters can contain sewage and chemicals. ■

Why Vegetation Management Matters

THERE'S SOMETHING MAJESTIC about trees. They ground us. They remind us of where we've been, and they stretch toward what's ahead. In our community, we take pride in the natural beauty that surrounds us—the shade on a summer afternoon, the colors that mark the changing seasons, the quiet strength of something that grows slowly but endures.

Here at Karnes Electric Cooperative, we share a responsibility that's just as essential to our daily lives. That responsibility is to keep the lights on, to power homes and businesses, and to make sure that the energy you depend on is there when you flip a switch.

That's why we work every day to strike a careful balance between preserving the beauty we cherish and delivering the reliable electricity you expect.

One of the most important ways we do that is through tree trimming. Now, it may not always be obvious, but keeping lines clear of overgrown vegetation plays a major role in preventing power outages. We've all seen what can happen when severe weather rolls in—strong winds, heavy ice or sudden storms can bring down branches and, with them, power lines and poles. In fact, nearly half of all power outages can be traced back to trees and vegetation coming into contact with electrical infrastructure.

That's why you may notice crews from Karnes EC or our trusted contractors working in neighborhoods throughout the year. Our crews are highly trained and certified, following the latest industry standards to ensure the job is done safely and effectively. Their work might seem routine, but it's a proactive step that helps prevent problems before they start.

And it's not just a good practice—it's required. Electric utilities across the country are obligated to manage vegetation near power lines. Scheduled trimming helps remove dead or weakened limbs and keeps fast-growing trees from becoming hazards. It's about staying one step ahead, especially as we prepare for the increasing frequency and intensity of severe weather events.

But beyond reliability, there's another reason this work matters: safety. Electricity is a powerful force, and when trees grow too close to power lines, that power can become dangerous. Branches that touch lines—or even come close—can carry electrical current. Children climbing trees in their own yards may not realize the risk. And during storms, fallen trees can create hazardous conditions not only for families but also for our line-workers working to restore service.

There's also a financial reality we can't ignore. Preventative maintenance—like tree trimming—is far more cost-effective than repairing widespread damage after an outage. Left unchecked, overgrown vegetation can lead to more frequent disruptions and higher costs for everyone. A thoughtful, strategic vegetation management program helps keep those costs down for our members.

You can help, too. When planting new trees, consider their mature height and distance from nearby power lines. Trees that grow up to 40 feet should be planted at least 25 feet away from overhead lines. Trees that exceed 40 feet should be planted at least 50 feet away.

If you're landscaping near padmounted transformers, keep shrubs at least 10 feet from the front and 4 feet from the sides to allow safe access.

At the end of the day, we all want the same thing: a community that's safe, resilient and beautiful. At Karnes EC, we're proud to be part of that effort. Our roots run deep here, just like the trees we work to care for. ■

The Wittliff Collections celebrates 40 years with a new exhibit

STORY AND PHOTOS BY ANNA MAZUREK

CORMAC MCCARTHY'S WRITING DESK and the last guitar pick used by Stevie Ray Vaughan are part of a new exhibit that celebrates the 40th anniversary of the Wittliff Collections—a research center, archive and museum on the Texas State University campus in San Marcos.

The exhibit, The Spirit of the Wittliff in 40 Objects, showcases 40 items—some iconic and some obscure—that embody the essence of a collection that's dedicated to preserving the cultural heritage of Texas, the Southwest and Mexico.

Originally founded in 1986 by screenwriter Bill Wittliff and his wife, Sally, the collection started as the Southwestern Writers Collection with the archive of folklorist J. Frank Dobie. A few years later, Wittliff donated his production archive of the Emmy-winning Lonesome Dove miniseries, which he wrote, and convinced many of the crew, including the set and costume designers, to do the same, creating a permanent exhibit.

In 1996, the Southwestern & Mexican Photography Collection was established, followed by the Texas Music Collection in 2017.

Literary curator Carrie Fountain selected the items for the new exhibit. "I saw it as an opportunity to really learn the collections myself," says Fountain, a New Mexico native and the 2019 poet laureate of Texas who joined the Wittliff last July.

Her goal was to make a well-rounded exhibit with multigenerational appeal. The exhibit entrance features one of Willie Nelson's bandannas and a Wyatt McFadden photograph of Beyoncé sporting pigtails, a headband and a T-shirt showing a photo of Nelson—also in pigtails and a headband—illustrating one generation's influence on the next.

During the curation process, Fountain gravitated toward items that "signified a larger narrative or an interesting little piece of a larger narrative." One of those objects was a historical American Girl doll named Josefina Montoya. It's accompanied by correspondence between the Pleasant Co., which manufactured the doll, and historian Marc Simmons, who oversaw a multiyear process to ensure the doll was a historically and culturally accurate depiction of a girl living in 1824 New Mexico.

First drafts of famous works and inklings of future success by writers Sandra Cisneros, McCarthy and poet Naomi Shihab Nye are also on display. Other unique highlights include a drafted alternate ending scene of the movie Cast Away by William Broyles Jr. and the first letter author Rick Riordan received from an editor about Percy Jackson and the Olympians, a series that would later achieve global fame.

"(Bill Wittliff) wanted these materials to inspire people," says Texas music curator Hector Saldaña, a former music journalist for the San Antonio Express-News who joined the organization in 2017. Saldaña has fond memories of his three-hour job interview with Wittliff that "flew by" thanks to Wittliff's charisma, along with Wittliff's last visit to the gallery just days before his death from a heart attack in June 2019.

Saldaña, like Wittliff before him, loves seeing students motivated by the first drafts on display and the perseverance of following a dream. "I always try to notice what people are attracted to," says Saldaña, who crafts exhibits based on observations, including The Selena Effect, an exhibit about the Grammy-winning Tejano singer that runs through December 6.

When an unpublished photograph of teenage Selena dancing on stage by photographer Al Rendon was displayed in a remote gallery corner, Saldaña noticed students taking selfies and gathering around it, deep in thought. He instantly became curious about the emotions the image evoked in younger generations.

"It was right then that I thought of the title The Selena Effect and knew I would do some kind of exhibit about that feeling," he says. The exhibit inspired a Texas State class assignment in the fashion merchandising department about how to style Selena today.

Several Wittliff exhibits focus on recent acquisitions, including the archives of Grammy-winning singer-songwriter Shawn Colvin and Austin artist Daniel Johnston and a first look at the 2024 McCarthy acquisition that doubled the size of the collection. These, along with the permanent Lonesome Dove exhibit, are open to the public for free.

One of the most pivotal moments for the Wittliff Collections was finding a home at Texas State, Saldaña says. The collection is funded by the university, an endowment from the Wittliff family and donations. Located on the seventh floor of the Albert B. Alkek Library, the 15,000-square-foot space went through two expansions, in 2009 and 2020, with plans to expand further in the next five to 10 years.

The university's May 2025 master plan included a new campus building for a dedicated gallery and programming space, while the current location will be utilized for research. A fundraising drive for the expansion is underway to raise $20 million, which the university will match.

"The biggest challenge has been processing acquisitions," says Saldaña, noting it's very labor-intensive, and staffing would likely increase with the expansion. The museum has a staff of 15, including photography curator Carla Ellard. In March, Marise McDermott, former president and CEO of San Antonio's Witte Museum, took over as executive director.

The team's focus is programming and processing notable acquisitions, including works of artist Kerry Awn, singer-songwriter and actor Stephen Bruton, country musician and songwriter Chris Wall, and folk singer Carolyn Hester. The museum is in the process of acquiring the archives of Yellowstone screenwriter Taylor Sheridan.

"Everyone that works at the Wittliff realizes ... we are only temporary stewards of this material," Saldaña says. "We're privileged to do it."

Fountain is focused on the future and keeping a pulse on topics researchers and students want to study, drawing inspiration from the collection's founding archive of Dobie, who said, "Great literature transcends its native land, but none that I know of ignores its soil."

That weighs on Fountain. "For me, the future of the Wittliff is both expanding the geographical definition of the American Southwest and making that bigger geographically, culturally (and) artistically," she says. "It's a tremendous responsibility." ■

SACRED STONE OF THE SOUTHWEST IS ON THE BRINK OF EXTINCTION

Centuries ago, Persians, Tibetans and Mayans considered turquoise a gemstone of the heavens, believing the striking blue stones were sacred pieces of sky. Today, the rarest and most valuable turquoise is found in the American Southwest— but the future of the blue beauty is unclear.

On a recent trip to Tucson, we spoke with fourth generation turquoise traders who explained that less than five percent of turquoise mined worldwide can be set into jewelry and only about twenty mines in the Southwest supply gem-quality turquoise. Once a thriving industry, many Southwest mines have run dry and are now closed.

We found a limited supply of turquoise from Arizona and purchased it for our Sedona Turquoise Collection. Inspired by the work of those ancient craftsmen and designed to showcase the exceptional blue stone, each stabilized vibrant cabochon features a unique, one-of-a-kind matrix surrounded in Bali metalwork. It's About Time

How cowboys counted the hours out on the dusty trail

BY W.F. STRONG • ILLUSTRATION BY BRYAN PETERSON

COWBOY TIME ISN'T fast or slow. It isn't tied to a clock at all. It's tied to the sun, the herd and the work.

On cattle drives of long ago, the day began before first light. At dawn, men were in the saddle, driving cattle north to Abilene or Dodge City in Kansas. They worked till sundown. No whistle blew, no shift horn called them home. The only time that mattered was daylight and whether the herd was settled for the night.

Even so, cowboys had their own kind of alarm clock. It was the cook's bell.

Legendary rancher Charles Goodnight invented the chuck wagon in the 1860s, repurposing a heavy-duty government wagon as a kitchen and pantry on wheels. And with the chuck wagon came the sound that structured cowboy life. When the cook struck his triangle of iron, it was dinnertime. Cowboys joked that the cook had the only watch that mattered.

At night, men took turns watching the cattle. Time wasn't measured in minutes but in watches—three shifts through the night. There was the first guard, the mid-night guard and the morning guard. Dying campfire embers and the movement of stars and the moon helped tell the passing of time in the dark.

A cowboy might sing his herd to sleep, humming trail songs or gospel tunes under the stars. The cattle calmed to the music, and time passed by melody more than clock.

Even distance was measured differently.

TCP Listen as W.F. Strong narrates this story on our website.

Cowboys spoke of horse time. They'd say: "That's a two-horse ride from here." Time was bound up with distance, and distance with the stamina of your mount.

Some cowboys did carry watches—tough old Elgin or Waltham pocket watches, often bought when railroads made timetables important. But plenty of them would tell you: "The only watch I need is the sun."

They were more on God's time than man's time.

Writers caught on to this too. Andy Adams, a cattle driver himself, described in The Log of a Cowboy trailmen rising with the dawn, eating when the cook said so and changing guard by the stars.

J. Frank Dobie wrote that a cowpuncher "eats when the cook's ready, he sleeps when the guard lets him." Larry McMurtry gave us cowboys singing to their cattle through the night, timing their lives by starlight and dust.

So cowboy time was different. It was steady. It ran sunup to sundown, with a few hours stolen under the stars. It was measured by horses, by bells, by songs—by the needs of the herd, not by a clock on the wall.

And maybe that's why cowboy time still has a hold on us here in Texas. Even if we don't ride herd anymore, there's something in us that remembers. We work till the sun goes down. We eat when the food's ready. We measure time by what matters, not by what buzzes on our phones—or at least we'd like to.

In a world of atomic clocks, digital seconds and meetings scheduled down to the minute, cowboy time whispers a different wisdom: Don't count every minute—just do the work until the day is done. ■

OVER 30 GENUINE
WHITE TOPAZ

LAVISHLY PLATED IN 18K GOLD

Wear a reminder that you can take the girl out of Texas, but not the Texas out of the girl with this exquisitely detailed bracelet! Expertly handcrafted and lavishly plated in gleaming 18K gold, this bracelet captures the pride of Texas. A charm showcasing the silhouette of the state serves as the centerpiece for this dazzling design, and a smaller cowboy boot charm captures the spirit of the Texas Gal. Tooled leather-inspired details with rich platinum plating add classic cowgirl style. A sparkling genuine white topaz in a heart-shaped setting sits over the spot where the capital of Austin is located on the map. Both charms dangle from the easy-to-secure horseshoe-shaped toggle ring. Elegant beads on either side of the toggle ring dazzle with more than 30 additional white topaz, and links with twisted rope details add to the authentic look. The reverse side of the Texas-shaped charm is delicately engraved with a classic Texas girl sentiment for a perfect finishing touch. This bracelet measures 7.5" and is sized to comfortably fit most wrists.

COURTESY CHET GARNER

The Palace in Paris

Statesmanship and storytelling at the Sam Bell Maxey House

BY CHET GARNER

IF YOU'VE EVER wondered what it felt like to be a big deal in 19th-century Texas, I'd suggest a stroll through the Sam Bell Maxey House State Historic Site in Paris. And yes, that's Paris, Texas—where the Eiffel Tower wears a cowboy hat.

Built 1866–67, the Maxey House is a pristine example of High Victorian Italianate architecture—which is a fancy way of saying it looks like it belongs in a period drama. It was added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1971 and restored in 1980.

Walking through the house feels less like touring a museum and more like you've interrupted a well-appointed 1870s dinner party. The wide balcony and tall windows were designed to battle the Texas heat, though I suspect they were also perfect for watching neighbors and discussing politics.

Sam Bell Maxey wasn't just any resident in Reconstruction-era Paris. He was a veteran of the Mexican-American War and a former Confederate general. Later he served as a state and then U.S. senator.

Following the Civil War, senior officers in the Confederacy were not allowed to hold political office, but Maxey received a pardon from President Andrew Johnson after a personal vouch from Maxey's U.S. Military Academy classmate and friend, Ulysses S. Grant. During his two terms, Maxey was known as "the Beaver of the Senate" for his work improving transportation and infrastructure.

What struck me most wasn't just the grandeur of the home but the humanity. The preserved letters, clothing and everyday objects tell a fuller story—of ambition, loss, recovery and resilience during one of Texas' most turbulent eras. Outside, the gardens offer a tranquil respite, a soft contrast to the political storms once likely debated inside.

The Maxey House isn't just a monument to one man's legacy; it's a reminder that even in a small Texas town, the currents of our nation flowed right through the front door. ■

250 COLLECTION

FIRST-EVER 1776-2026 DUAL-DATED SILVER EAGLE

One-Year-Only, 250th Anniversary Silver Dollar You Need to Own—Most Will Miss Out!

For 40 years, America's Silver Eagle has stood as the world's most collected modern coin. This coin enters a new era of significance this year with an added feature collectors have never seen before. For the first time in the history of the annual series—and the first time in 50 years on any U.S. coin—the 2026-W Silver Eagle Proof bears a true dual date: 1776-2026. This un-precedented feature instantly sets this release apart as the most historic Silver Eagle ever struck. In addition, a one-year-only Liberty Bell 250 privy mark has been added to the design, further elevating it to the upper pantheon of U.S. coins.

A Once-in-a-Generation Opportunity

Some coins mark time. Others make history. The 2026-W American Silver Eagle Proof does both. For people who remember the excitement surrounding dual-dated 1976 Bicentennial coinage, the significance of 2026 needs no explanation. For those new to the scene, this represents an opportunity that won't come again in our lifetimes.

Don't Miss Out on a True Legacy

Even before the official release date of February 26, single 2026-W Proof American Silver Eagles recorded pre-sales of just over 209,000 coins, or about 42% of its stated 500,000 mintage before the coin was even available. The remaining coins from the first allotment have since been sold. While the Mint does intend to strike the remaining authorized mintage, don't run the risk of missing out on acquiring a true legacy for you and your family that will be prized for generations to come.

To add one of these first-ever dual-dated 2026-W American Silver Eagle Proofs with Liberty Bell 250 Privy Mark to your collection, call 1-800-517-6468 to secure yours now.

Wallow Awhile

Maybe pigs are onto something with their love of mud

BY CYNTHIA L. MATLOCK

ILLUSTRATION BY GEORGE SWEETLAND

IF YOU'VE SPENT any time around pigs, you know one thing for sure: They like mud. I learned this firsthand growing up on a farm, where I often admired and despised the pigs we raised. Especially when they wallowed in the mud on hot summer days.

At feeding time, if the hogs were not already in the pen, my sister and I would have to go out into the woods and round them up, chasing them through the brush and trees. Sometimes, instead of heading to the trough, they'd detour down to the creek, flopping joyfully in the mud. Ugh!

I often wished I could hose them off first—clean them up before feeding them—as drying mud covered their hides, from their snouts to their hooves. One would open his mouth as if smiling and follow us along the fencerow with his curly tail wagging.

How disgusting but freeing. It seemed incredibly liberating to get muddy, smile and not worry about what anyone thought.

As much as I wrinkled my nose, I came to understand why they did it. Rolling in mud cools pigs down quickly—by nearly 4 degrees, according to some sources—far more efficiently than sweating. Our white Yorkshires, with their sunburn-prone pink hides, often stayed coated in mud, which worked like a natural sunscreen.

And I couldn't help but envy their wild abandon. The closest I've come to that exhilarating, freeing feeling is a good jump in a swimming pool. Or a swerve in a car to splash through standing water. As the years roll on and adult responsibilities pile up, it can be harder to make time to unwind—for most of us.

While I've been dodging dirty things all my life, others have been diving right in—literally. Near my childhood home in Jacksonville, mud is always part of the scene. Crowds of off-roaders come roaring in on all-terrain vehicles, trucks and dirt bikes, churning up treacherous pits and sending mud flying as engines growl and vehicles launch into the air. Mud fights draw big crowds—slick with thick, sticky mud. It's all in good fun.

When life feels heavy with frustrating deadlines, unnerving family drama, surprise bills and unexpected detours, it makes me want to run through mud or a puddle.

Naturally, children can't resist the pull of a fresh puddle after a heavy rain. They stomp through the shallow water, sending droplets dancing in the air. Even more fun is plopping down, feeling the squishy mud ooze between their fingers and shaping it into a rounded mud pie.

Maybe that's why mud and water play still calls us. It's not just for pigs, or kids, but for all of us. Jump in, let's wallow awhile. ■
